

As a follow-up to our recent blog on the SEC moving back the deadline for that agency to act on the NYSE's and Nasdaq's clawback proposals, it's worth noting that recent conversations between Corp Fin Staffers and practitioners suggest that the June 11th date is firm and will not be further extended. Since June 11th is a Sunday that means that action would have to take place by June 9th. These indications are consistent with the SEC's discussion of the process used to extend the deadline in the April 24th orders.

Companies should be taking action now since it's likely that the SEC will approve the listing standards no later than June 9th. That timeline means that new clawback policies would have to be in place by August 8th (i.e., 60 days later). Most boards and compensation committees don't meet during the mid-summer, so waiting may result in the need for special meetings or unanimous written consents...

Explore more in

Corporate Law

Blog series

Public Chatter

Public Chatter provides practical guidance—and the latest developments—to those grappling with public company securities law and corporate governance issues, through content developed from an in-house perspective.

View the blog