

A number of media outlets (such as this Politico article and this Forbes piece) are reporting that the SEC Commissioners are reviewing a draft of the adopting release that would finalize the SEC's climate disclosure rules that were proposed a few years ago. There hasn't been an announcement to calendar an open Commission meeting to adopt the rules – but rumors indicate it could be as soon as sometime in March. Of course, rumors often prove to be incorrect – so we shall see.

And this Reuters article goes even further and reports on the rumor that the final rule might not include a Scope 3 disclosure requirement. That would not be a surprise, as SEC Chair Gensler has indicated over the past few months that investors were split over their desire for Scope 3 disclosures.

Explore more in

Corporate Law

Blog series

Public Chatter

Public Chatter provides practical guidance—and the latest developments—to those grappling with public company securities law and corporate governance issues, through content developed from an in-house perspective.

View the blog